Which States Reward College Savers?

A recent Adviser Fund Update focused on the basics of 529 plans. In this edition, we'll continue examining 529s with a look at tax implications, risk strategies and the implications on financial aid eligibility.

- Which States Reward College Savers?

529 Tax Implications

Contributions to 529 plans are not tax deductible, though earnings made in the plans are not subject to federal taxes when used properly. Account owners can make annual gifts of up to $14,000 for single tax filers and $28,000 for those filing jointly to a beneficiary without exceeding the annual federal gift tax limit.

529s can work well as wealth transfer and estate planning vehicles. You can make a one-time contribution between $14,000 and $70,000 for a beneficiary and choose to treat the deposit as if it was made over a five-year period for gift tax purposes. For people whose financial professionals are advising them to reduce estate tax exposure, here's a way to "gift" your assets without giving them up completely; revoke the account and its value comes back to your estate.

Withdrawals also can have tax implications. Even if you know the exact amount of tuition you want to withdraw, make sure to subtract any grants or scholarships. As we discussed last time, taking out more money than you need for education-related expenses can lead to a paying federal income tax and a 10% penalty on the difference between qualified and non-qualified distributions.

More than 30 states and the District of Columbia currently offer a tax credit or deduction on 529 plans. If you live in one of these states, there could be a strong incentive to invest at home. Arizona, Kansas, Maine, Missouri, Montana and Pennsylvania offer tax parity, meaning you can invest in any state's plan and get that state's tax benefits.

Tax Parity States

State	Maximum Annual 529 Deduction
Arizona	$2,000 single or head of household/$4,000 joint
Kansas	$3,000 single/$6,000 joint per beneficiary
Maine	Up to $250 per beneficiary (any state plan) for contributors with adjusted gross income of $100,000 or less if single filer or $200,000 or less if filing jointly
Missouri	$8,000 single/$16,000 joint per beneficiary
Montana	$3,000 single/$6,000 joint per beneficiary
Pennsylvania	$14,000 single/$28,000 joint per beneficiary

Managing Your 529 Plan

As many investors scale back their equity allocation and opt for more fixed-income investments on the approach to and beginning of retirement, a similar strategy can make sense with 529s. By starting early, it may make sense to weight the 529's investments more towards equities, which generally have better long-term growth potential than bonds or cash. Once college expenses come closer, you might feel that fixed income is more appropriate to protect your earnings and make sure that you are insulated against market declines now that you actually need the money. Under current tax law, you can reallocate your account once a year.

(Speaking of retirement, parents need to consider their own priorities if weighing the decision to only fund their own retirement portfolio or a child's 529 fund. After all, your child can always borrow money for college. You can't borrow money for retirement.)

Other college savers can opt for age-based 529 plans to avoid the legwork of shifting allocations. Vanguard, for example, offers a questionnaire for parents to determine their risk tolerance. Once set on a conservative, moderate or aggressive course, Vanguard will automatically adjust asset allocation over time, gradually shifting from stocks to bonds as college age approaches. Many other plans share similar risk or age-based tracks for more hands-off investors.

Financial Aid Implications

The College Cost Reduction and Access Act of 2007 (CCRAA) enacted legislation to treat assets held in 529 prepaid tuition plans and college savings plans as parental assets (rather than as belonging to the student), and thus generally have little impact on a student's federal financial aid eligibility. Savings in 529 funds are reported on the student's Free Application for Financial Aid (FAFSA) as parental assets, which are currently assessed at 5.64%. For example, under the CCRAA, if a student's parents have $25,000 in a 529 plan, only $1,410 will be considered the student's "Expected Family Contribution."

Let's walk through an example, assuming you file the FAFSA aid application when your child is a high school senior. You have a 529 account with $100,000 in it, of which $50,000 was your initial contribution and $50,000 is earnings. In the first year, your child's eligibility for federal financial aid will decrease by no more than 5.64% of the account value, or $5,640. Assuming the account value stays the same over the course of the year and you withdraw $20,000 to pay for freshman year education expenses, when you apply for sophomore year aid, your account value is now $80,000, which is again assessed at 5.64%, or $4,512. The $20,000 withdrawal included $10,000 of excluded earnings with it, but none of the withdrawal is counted as financial aid income.

There is a widespread misunderstanding, even on the websites of many plan administrators, of the impact of a grandparent's 529 plan on a student's eligibility for need-based financial aid. True, the value of 529 plan assets owned by a grandparent (or any non-parent) is not reportable on the FAFSA application.

However, precisely because grandparent-owned 529s do not have to be reported as an asset on FAFSA applications, any distributions from those 529s are considered untaxed student income on the next year's FAFSA. Any financial support given to a student from their grandparents, even 529 distributions, counts as untaxed income and is reportable on the next year's FAFSA as student income.

There are ways to circumvent this. The savvy grandparent might wait to use the 529 account to pay for senior year of college, when the student will not need to worry about applying for financial aid again. Grandparents can also transfer the account to a parent, so the 529 counts as parental assets, as seen above. Finally, grandparents can wait until the student has graduated and take a non-qualified distribution (perhaps to pay off student loans). While you'll pay income taxes and a penalty on the earnings of non-qualified distributions, those hits can be less than losing eligibility as a result of untaxed income going to the student via 529 distributions.

Notable 529 Plans

In an upcoming Adviser Fund Update, we'll conclude our series on 529s with an in-depth look under the hood of several popular plans, including the Maryland College Investment Plan, T. Rowe Price College Savings Plan, The Vanguard 529 and the Utah Educational Plan. We'll also give our take on Fidelity's 529 plan options.
